Introduction

As a parent you sometimes wonder if you did a good enough job in raising your children. Sadly, there are some parents who could care less about how their children grow up. But there are many more that do care about how their children are raised. Did we give them enough? Did we give them too much?

When it came down to spiritual matters Christian parents often wonder if they were a good enough example for their children as they were growing up. Were their children exposed to godly influences? Did their children have access to godly influences? This is especially important during the adolescent years when children try to find their pathway in their own life. Did they, as Christian parents, get their children into too many ministry related events? Not enough?

There are numerous other issues parents wonder about, sometimes to the point of fussing over them. Many parents try to shove their religion down a child’s metaphorical throat which normally drives a child away from God. Instead they should train up a child and then trust God to draw their children into a Christ centered relationship.

In this case we, my wife Debbie, and I can say our two daughters have grown to be the godly women we always wanted them to be. Both daughters have married hard working men of God who value family as much as my wife and I do. When you come from a dysfunctional family as my wife and I have done you strive for a different life for your children.

This story is about one woman's God inspired love for her sister who was unable to have children of her own. Our eldest daughter Chris and her husband have suffered through five heartbreaking miscarriages. They finally came to the realization that they were to be one of those couples who spent their lives together childless. Chris had previously confided to Debbie that Chris and her husband, Elliot were content to live that way if it was the will of God. However, God wasn't saying no to them having a child of their own.

Our youngest daughter Kim felt the call of God to become a surrogate for her sister. After having two beautiful daughters of her own our youngest knew what heartache her sister was going through. Mary answered the call to bear a child named Jesus for the world who brought joy into the world. Kim answered God's call for her to bear a child for her sister and brought joy into our families.

This is their story through a parent's point of view.
